The book draws on archival research, oral histories, and case studies from around the world to provide a comprehensive understanding of the organizations' impact on social change and the lives of individuals and communities. It shows how the YMCA and YWCA have been pioneers in the field of social work, developing innovative programs and services that have addressed the needs of marginalized and vulnerable populations.

The YMCA and YWCA in the 19th Century

The YMCA was founded in London in 1844 by George Williams, a young draper's assistant who was concerned about the moral and spiritual well-being of young men in the city. The YWCA was founded in 1858 in New York City by a group of women who were concerned about the welfare of young women in the city's slums.

From the beginning, both organizations were committed to providing social services to their communities. The YMCA offered a variety of programs and services for young men, including housing, education, and recreation. The YWCA provided similar services for young women, as well as programs that addressed the specific needs of women, such as job training and childcare.

In the late 19th century, the YMCA and YWCA began to expand their work internationally. The YMCA established branches in Europe, Asia, and Africa, and the YWCA established branches in Europe, Asia, and Latin America. This expansion was driven by a desire to share the organizations' Christian values and to provide social services to communities around the world.

The YMCA and YWCA in the 20th Century

The YMCA and YWCA continued to expand their social work programs in the 20th century. In the United States, the YMCA and YWCA played a major role in the development of the social work profession. They established schools of social work and provided training for social workers. They also developed innovative social work programs, such as settlement houses, community centers, and youth programs.

Internationally, the YMCA and YWCA continued to provide social services in communities around the world. They established schools, hospitals, and orphanages. They also provided disaster relief and other emergency services.

In the mid-20th century, the YMCA and YWCA began to play a more active role in international cooperation. They participated in the founding of the United Nations and other international organizations. They also worked with other organizations to promote peace and development around the world.
